

Sustaining Montgomery County: the History of Food and Food Production

On the farms, in the kitchens, and at the stores of Montgomery County during the nineteenth and twentieth century was a complex process of food production that has been replaced by modern technology, conveniences, transportation, and grocery stores. The historic foodways in our area are often fondly remembered and are some of the most important aspects of our local culture and identity.

The new exhibit at the Montgomery Museum will explore the variety of foods consumed during the historic period and look at how many of them were produced. The exhibit will illustrate both local methods and how the county was tied into larger regional and national food production trends. The exhibit will be open from January 9th through June.
